TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 9.

THE TOMB OF LEE.—The famous Temple of Vesta was not served with more devotion, nor its sacred fire more religiously guarded by the daughters of free-born Roman citizens, than the tomb of Lee is tenderly and tastefully cared for by Virginia's maidens. A visit to the sacred spot during Christmas holidays gave us evidence that there was no weariness in the service, nor lack of ministry, but through all these years has known no change, with gathered power is still the same.

The tomb was exquisitely adorned with beautiful flowers of almost every variety, and evergreens of crosses and crescents dotedly arranged by the hand of a fair woman. What a commentary upon the times! The defeated hero of our dear Southern land lies buried in a chapel reared under his own direction for the worship of the Almighty Father; his tomb daily cared for by sorrowing woman (no, not sorrowing, for we thank God we had such a die); his memory embalm'd in the hearts of his countrymen.

The man, if in contrast he deserves the appellation, to whom he surrendered, reclining about the streets of Washington, the companion of evil men, plotting the overthrow of his country and the enslavement of her citizens. Who would not rather be the dead Lee than the living Grant?

Such is the contrast and such were our sentiments upon visiting the tomb but so lately ornamented and beautified by the hands of devoted and cultured woman. A holy fragrance seemed to linger about the place and we were loth to quit its sacred precincts and return to the rudeness and coldness of the outer world.
